

Willem van Nijmegen (1636-1698)

Allegory of the loss of Arnhem, 10 June 1672

Pen and black and grey wash on paper
175 by 140 mm.

Inscribed (recto): 'Willem van Nymegen heeft dit geteykent A° 1672 den 10 Junius den dagh daer na als hy de stadt van Arenem heeft over sien geven, aen den hertogh van Touraine dien ick den trompetter van hem heb voor de stadt op hooren eysen. / Laat ons nu vrij haspillen / willen wij niet: sij willen'

Inscribed (verso): 'Schoenen muijlen en laarsen / 't komt al van den stieren twesen / mellick botter meis / 't komt al van den vaarsen' and with several sketches of coat of arms²

Provenance

Sale, Vendu Notarishuis, Rotterdam, 11 November 2012, lot 133

Private collection, The Netherlands

Note

Willem van Nijmegen was born in 1636 in Zaltbommel.³ Although it is unknown who his teacher was, Van Nijmegen belongs to a dynasty of artists. He was an early specialist in grisailles for the decoration of interiors and well known for his imitations of marble. He also executed trompe l'oeil decorations in the form of landscapes appearing as engravings. From 1675 to 1690, Van Nijmegen was a member of the Guild of Saint Luke in The Hague, while he is also listed as a Guild member in Delft in 1684. From 1690 until his death on 12 October 1698, Van Nijmegen resided in Haarlem.

¹ "Willem van Nijmegen has drawn this A° 1672 the 10th of June, the day after he saw the city of Arnhem capitulate to the Duke of Touraine, when I heard his trumpet player claim the city. Let us now freely reel, we do not want: they want."

² Only one of the coat of arms is identifiable with the Van Welderen family crest. Johan van Welderen, lieutenant-general of the cavalry, in command of the nearby town of Nijmegen as of June, early July 1672 and Diederik van Welderen, nobleman of the county of Nijmegen, both defended their region in the battle against Turenne.

³ Biographical information from: A. van der Willigen & F. Meijer, A Dictionary of Dutch and Flemish Still-life Painters Working in Oils, 1525-1725, Leiden 2003, p. 150

Although a popular artist in his time, very few works by Van Nijmegen are known today. Some trompe l'oeil portraits of his predecessors, such as Hendrick Goltzius and Rembrandt, are in private collections, while a grisaille of Laocoön is in the Národní Galerie, Prague. The first known trompe l'oeil painting of an individual print was made around 1650 by Sebastian Stosskopff, now in the Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna. However, Van Nijmegen addressing himself directly to the viewer as in the present drawing seems to be unique for his time.⁴ It is no secret that the Dutch have an inclination to be direct and the artist confirms this through his remarkable bravura.

Although usually the trompe l'oeil effect is accomplished by an engraving on a wooden panel, in the present Allegory of the loss of Arnhem, the drawing itself simulates a print. If not for the inscription, we would seemingly have a genre representation of a woman spinning yarn. However, the elaborated text explains that this work was created the day after the siege of the city of Arnhem by the French army. 1672 is known as the Disaster Year ('Rampjaar'), when the Dutch Republic was under attack by the British and French armies as well as the dioceses of Cologne and Munster. Even in the unoccupied territories people lived with fear as banks, schools and courts closed. Artists and art dealers suffered during this crisis that bankrupted many.

Knowing that Prince Willem III, Stadholder of Holland, had fled, the French Marshal, Vicomte de Turenne (1611-1675) gave the city of Arnhem an ultimatum. If the city refused immediate capitulation, its citizens would not survive. The city fought hard but the army surrendered on June 17th, after learning the Prince had fled. Possibly Van Nijmegen was aware of Quast's engraving published in 1652, depicting a peasant couple spinning yarn on a spindle with the devil in the background trying to unravel the spun thread.⁵ Van Nijmegen's allegory is subtler than the preceding engraving as he only portrays the spinning woman, not as symbol of virtue, but the accompanying inscription revealing the circumstances. The last sentence of the drawing's inscription translates as "Let us spin / we do not want: they want" indicating the desire to 'let us be' or leave us alone.

Pieter Jansz. Quast

The devil messing up the yarn, 1634-40

Etching, 212 x 165 mm.

Rijksmuseum, inv.no. RP-P-OB-81.750

⁴ A. Tummers, 'The Painter Versus his Critics: Willem van Nijmegen's Defense of his Art', in: Aemulatio. Imitation, emulation and invention in Netherlandish art from 1500 to 1800. Essays in honor of Eric Jan Sluiter, Zwolle 2011, p. 438

⁵ Dieuwke de Hoop Scheffer, "Een serie bedelaars door Pieter Quast: 'T Is Al Verwart-Gaeren'", in: Bulletin van het Rijksmuseum, 1974, Vol. 22, No. 4, pp. 166-172. This print is possibly a satire on the English as indicated by its date of publication.

*Shoes mules and boots
It all comes from the bull's creature
Milk butter grass-cheese
It all comes from the young cow*

It is unclear how the poem on the verso of the drawing relates to the fall of Arnhem. Surrounded by sketches of coat of arms, the rhyme is likely to be related to Arnhem. Poems allowed an artist to respond very quickly to current events and to immediately intervene in a process of judgement. The contradistinction between products stemming from a bull or a cow could possibly indicate the equally important contribution of women and men, in this case in the defense against foreign invasion.